

The forestry industry is a significant employer in rural and regional Australia. The industry directly employs about 52,000 people, who are involved in the growing and processing of forest products. Tens of thousands more Australians work in jobs that are indirectly supported by our forest industries

In regional areas particularly, Australia's competitive, sustainable and renewable forests are a key contributor to the community, including by:

providing jobs

providing recreation opportunities, including tracks and trails building regional communities through schools, sports, etc.

Benefits of forests

Australia's forests also provide us with places for recreation and tourism. We go to forests to:

bush walk

ride our bikes

picnic

walk our dogs

horse ride

four-wheel drive.

In fact, an average 4.2 million people visit major forested tourism regions for bush walking each year.

As our population continues to grow, so will our demand for wood products and our desire to use forests to relax and unwind.

Australian Forestry. Planning for tomorrow, today.

Source: <https://www.agriculture.gov.au/agriculture-land/forestry/planning-tomorrow/benefitting-our-communities>